DR. WHO

In this series of adventures in space and time the title-role will be played by William Hartnell

5.15

DR. WHO? That is just the point. Nobody knows precisely who he is, this mysterious exile from another world and a distant future whose adventures begin today. But this much is known: he has a ship in which he can travel through space and time—although, owing to a defect in its instruments he can never be sure where and when his ‘landings’ may take place. And he has a grand-daughter Susan, a strange amalgam of teenage normality and uncanny intelligence.

Playing the Doctor is the well-known film actor, William Hartnell, who has not appeared before on BBC-tv.

Each adventure in the series will cover several weekly episodes, and the first is by the Australian author Anthony Coburn. It begins by telling how the Doctor finds himself visiting the Britain of today: Susan (played by Carole Ann Ford) has become a pupil at an ordinary British school, where her incredible breadth of knowledge has whetted the curiosity of two of her teachers. These are the history teacher Barbara Wright (Jacqueline Hill), and the science master Ian Chesterton (William Russell), and their curiosity leads them to become inextricably involved in the Doctor's strange travels.

Because of the imperfections in the ship's navigation aids, the four travellers are liable in subsequent stories to find themselves absolutely anywhere in time—past, present, or future. They may visit a distant galaxy where civilisation has been devastated by the blast of a neutron bomb or they may find themselves journeying to far Cathay in the caravan of Marco Polo. The whole cosmos in fact is their oyster.

Dr. Who on the Dead Planet

Not many moments too soon, Dr. Who and his three companions in the space-time ship Tardis have extricated themselves from the grim and precarious society of prehistoric man on Earth. Once more, they are off on their travels—but to where? Can the Doctor still find some way to regain full control over his craft as it travels on, faster than light, through the fourth and fifth dimensions?

This is the situation when the second adventure in the odyssey of the strange Dr. Who, his grandchild Susan, and the two teachers Barbara and Ian starts this evening. The opening episode is called 'The Dead Planet' and it finds the travellers in a world which is, if possible, even weirder and less friendly than the one which they have just left. Everything is silent—and very still. There are trees with strange foliage—but no leaves rustle, although a strong breeze blows. There is no living soil—just dust and ashes. But even so, flowers of a sort are growing . . .

Barbara and Ian would be in no way sorry to leave this inhospitable place, but for the Doctor scientific curiosity must come first. 'Fascinating!' he muses. 'A petrified jungle . . . doubt if it could have been the heat . . . I intend to try and find out.' And so it looks as if there is to be no return to a familiar civilisation just yet.

This second serial, which has been written by Terry Nation, is directed by Christopher Barry.

The four travellers inside their unusual space ship are joined by a strange presence in today's

Dr. WHO

ONCE again the space craft Tardis, with her four voluntary and involuntary passengers, has succeeded in escaping unharmed from a desperate situation. Once again, the voyagers are travelling freely through time and space. But the master of the Tardis, the enigmatic Dr. Who (William Hartnell) himself, is still apparently no nearer to finding a way to return with his granddaughter Susan (Carole Ann Ford) to the place and time in which he belongs; and the problem of getting Ian (William Russell) and Barbara (Jacqueline Hill) back to their home in twentieth-century Britain also remains unsolved.

So far the uncertain course of the ship—which is still only partially under the Doctor's control—has taken the travellers far back in time to man's Paleolithic age on the planet Earth, when a primitive community's only hope of survival lay in its ability to make fire. And it has taken them far out into distant space, to a world shattered by a nuclear disaster where the Thals, remnants of an advanced civilisation, are battling with the soul-less Daleks.

Now, the travellers in alliance with the Thals, have destroyed the Daleks for good, and Tardis has left the world of Skaro to its true owners. But Dr. Who has decided to experiment with the ship's guidance system in a desperate effort to regain his bearings. He juggles with a new combination of levers, there is a violent explosion, and Tardis stops dead. Slowly the door opens but on to what? And, more sinister, are there only four travellers in the ship—or has the open door admitted a fifth presence, unseen, but none the less powerful?

DR. WHO

Today the travellers begin a new adventure in medieval China

5.15

FROM the galactic battle of the Thals and the Daleks, from the tense drama played out within Tardis itself, Dr. Who's strange vessel has travelled on once more, and today it has touched ground again to launch its four passengers on a new adventure.

Its landing place is Earth—but not the comfortable settled Earth that the Doctor and Susan knew during their sojourn in the twentieth century. This is far Cathay, the fabled land of silks and spices which we know as China. The time is the thirteenth century, and the Empire of the fierce Tartars is at the peak of its power. In Peking Kublai Khan holds his magnificent court.

But the travellers have not been lucky enough to land amid the delights of Kublai's pleasure domes. Tardis has brought them instead to the very fringe of his Empire, to the icy slopes of the high Pamir. This was the fearful mountain barrier which had long kept Cathay almost isolated from the new civilisation emerging in the west.

The early explorers called the Pamir 'the roof of the world,' so that is the title of today's episode. And very soon Dr. Who and his companions are to discover that they are not the only travellers on that inhospitable plateau. A caravan is making its painful way towards the capital of the Tartars, and leading it is a young Venetian in the service of Kublai Khan. His name? Marco Polo.

Dr. Who and his companions meet Marco Polo and the Mongols on 'the roof of the world' in today's episode
